Qadd Humiss is a unique diving spot which offers a unique and breathtaking experience for divers. A huge band of coral extends around the island, and underwater canyons and mountains play host to a myriad of different types of fish and coral.

Focussed on the eastern side of the island and on the southern part of the main reef, the dive descends through a series of coral pinnacles which rise from the seabed in a multitude of colours. Soft corals such as the slimy leather coral are particularly abundant and their small white polyps glisten spectacularly in the light. Above the towering coral towers, divers can expect swathes of anthias and clownfish peeking out from behind the anemone.

The dive continues past sandy plateaus which, fringed with alcyonaries, sit at depths of 30m. The reef wall slopes down even further, making this dive one that is best suited for advanced and technical divers. Freedivers are also sure to find space for a thrilling plunge here.

Here, fusiliers often school together in large groups as a form of protection against potential predators. They are fascinating to watch, especially when confronted with a barracuda where they, in one singular motion, simultaneously change
